If you regularly use new computers to log in to Discord, you might be using your password to log in to Discord and typing a complex password becomes tiring. If this is you, the QR code login feature was made for you. It lets you log in to Discord without providing your email and password. In this article, we'll cover everything about Discord QR codes and also how to login to Discord with a QR code. It is such a simple and convenient feature. ✨ What to Know ✨ QR codes are a way to authenticate using your mobile phone. • QR code login requires the Discord app on your device. • QR codes are only valid for 2 minutes. After 2 minutes, a new one is generated. What is a Discord QR Code? Discord QR code is an alternate way to login into Discord. The discord QR code is displayed on the login page when you use the Discord desktop or browser client and has to be scanned by the Discord mobile app. A QR code is a barcode containing identifier data that can be read by processing the QR code image. Discord QR code contains a unique pattern that ties the login attempt to the computer. Once the login is confirmed, Discord servers precisely know which computer had requested the QR code login. With the QR code login feature, you can get logged in to Discord without having to type or share your login credentials (email and password). It is incredibly convenient if you don't trust the computer setup, are logging into a new computer, or have a complex password that is hard to remember and type. It is a secure way to login as you use your trusted mobile device to confirm the login attempt. ⚠️ Caution: Never use a QR code generated by someone else to try to login into your account. This might be an attempt to take over your account. Cancel the request right away. If you accidentally approved a login, change your password immediately and log out of all devices. You'll need a mobile device to use the Discord QR code login feature, as the QR code needs to be scanned by the Discord mobile app. While you can use the regular mobile camera app as well, using the Discord app makes the steps easier. Discord QR login feature is available for both iPhone (iOS) and Android phones. Before you being, download and install the Discord mobile app and log in. Step #1: Open the Discord login page on the PC (desktop app) or browser. The QR code appears on the right-hand side of this login page. Step #2: On the Discord mobile app, go to the home page (where you see all servers listed) and tap on your avatar in the bottom right corner to bring up the 'User Settings'. Step #3: Tap on the 'Scan QR Code' option in the 'User Settings'. If prompted, grant the app to use your phone's camera to scan the QR code. Step #4: When the scanner opens, bring the QR code being displayed on the login page within the green-edged box. It will scan automatically once the entire QR code is within the box. Step #5: On the next screen, tap on 'Yes, log me in' to confirm your login attempt. This will automatically log you in on the desktop or browser client. ⚠️ Note: If you are unable to scan the QR code within 2 minutes, then refresh or reload the login page again, and a new QR code will be displayed. There is no limit to how many QR codes can be displayed. Frequently Asked Questions (FAQs) The QR is displayed on the login screen when connecting to Discord through the desktop app or browser. If you cannot see it, try refreshing or reloading the login screen. You can use the QR code to login into Discord without having to provide your email and password. A screenshot QR code can be scanned as long as it is clearly visible. QR code is just a pattern to represent some data, and so a screenshot of this pattern would work too. ⚠️ We have more Discord tips for you. Now, that was easy. Once you start using the Discord QR code login feature, you'll never go back to manually typing your account credentials again. It is such a useful and straightforward feature that not only saves you time but keeps your credentials safe as well. Just remember: Do not scan QR codes that you did not generate, and reject all sign-in approvals that you did not trigger. The square barcodes show up everywhere: real estate listings, TV ads and social media posts touting what look like great deals on must-have items. The pandemic fueled a surge in the use of QR codes. Seeking to cut down on possible transmission, restaurants replaced physical menus available to all customers with online versions accessible on your own personal phone. Scan that little square and you'll find out what the house special is.Cybercriminals quickly took note and are starting to exploit the technology's undeniable convenience. Scammers are creating their own malicious QR codes designed to dupe unwitting consumers into handing over their banking or personal information.Think before you scan that QR code. Getty "Anytime new technology comes out, cybercriminals try to find a way to exploit it," said Angel Grant, vice president of security at F5, an app security company. That's especially true with tech like QR codes, which people know how to use but might not know how they work, she says. "It's easier to manipulate people if they don't understand it."QR codes – the abbreviation stands for "quick response" – were invented in Japan in the 1990s. They were first used by the automotive industry to manage production but have spread everywhere. Websites and apps have cropped up that let you make your own. ⚠️ Now they're being exploited by cybercriminals in a spin on an email phishing scam. Scanning the bogus QR codes won't do anything to your phone, such as download malware in the background. But it will take you to scammy websites designed to get bank account, credit card or other personal information. Like any other phishing scheme, it's impossible to know exactly how often QR codes are used for malicious purposes. Experts say they still represent a small percentage of overall phishing, but numerous scams involving QR code have been reported to the Better Business Bureau, especially in the past year.Most recently, the FBI issued a warning advising consumers to think before they scan potentially sketchy QR codes. Many people know they need to be on the lookout for phishy links and questionable attachments in emails that purport to be from the bank. But thinking twice about scanning a QR code with your smartphone camera isn't second nature for most people. A screenshot of the scam website drivers were led to when they used their phones to scan malicious QR code stickers on parking meters in Austin, Texas. Austin Transportation Taking advantage of unsuspecting motorists might have been behind the nearly 30 malicious QR code stickers recently found on parking meters in Austin, Texas, which uses QR code technology to let drivers pay for parking online. Instead of being taken to the city's authorized website or app, however, motorists who scanned the scam stickers were led to a fake website that collected their credit card information.Police don't know how many people were duped. The department encourages anyone who thinks they may have had their credit card information stolen by the fake website to contact them.Austin isn't the only city to experience bogus QR code scams. Officials in San Antonio, Texas, about 80 miles away, issued a warning after spotting similar stickers connected to a fake parking payment website. QR codes take people from the physical world to the online one. That's why it makes sense to use them in scam stickers, as well as paper junk mail, said Brad Haas, cyber threat intelligence analyst for Cofense, an email security company. It gets people online that weren't already.Haas says scam QR codes are also starting to show up in phishing emails and online ads, a tactic that leaves him scratching his head. "There's really no reason for someone to pull out their phone and scan a QR code that's in an email they're already looking at on their laptop," Haas said. After all, the recipient is already online with their laptop. Why would a legitimate sender want them to connect with a second device? For that reason, consumers should regard any email containing a QR code with suspicion, he says. Still, the phony codes show up in phishing emails, though not as often as tried-and-true tactics, like attachments containing viruses or links to scam websites. Cofense recently spotted a phishing scam targeting German speakers that included a QR code in an attempt to lure mobile banking users.A screenshot of a phishing email containing a malicious QR code spotted by Cofense researchers. Note that the QR code has been altered and will not lead to a malicious website. Cofense Hackers may like using QR codes in phishing emails because they often aren't picked up by security software, giving them a better chance to reach their intended targets than attachments or bad links, says Aaron Ansari, vice president for cloud security at the antivirus company Trend Micro.Even if the success rate is lower, it's a lot easier to send out millions of phishing emails than it is to physically place stickers on parking meters and bus stops.What it boils down to is that QR codes are just one more way for cybercriminals to get what they want and yet another threat people need to be on the lookout for. "There are so many ways for you to be compromised these days," Ansari said, "but it only takes one."Tips from the expertsThink before you scan. Be especially wary of codes posted in public places. Take a good look. Is it a sticker or part of a bigger sign or display? If the code doesn't look like it fits in with the background, ask for a paper copy of the document you're trying to access or type the URL in manually. When you do scan a QR code, take a good look at the website it led you to, and make sure it's the one you expected. Does it look like you expected it would? If it asks for login or banking information that doesn't seem needed, don't hand it over. Codes embedded in emails are almost always a bad idea. Take Haas' advice and skip these entirely. The same goes for codes you receive in unsolicited paper junk mail, such as those offering help with debt consolidation, Grant says.Preview the code's URL. Many smartphone cameras, including iPhones running the latest version of iOS, will give you a preview of a code's URL as you start to scan it. If the URL looks strange, you might want to move on.Better yet, Ansari recommends using a secure scanner app, which is designed to spot malicious links before your phone opens them. His company, Trend Micro, offers a free one, as do some of the other big antivirus companies.But stick to the well-known security companies. He says. Malicious QR scanning apps designed to scrape user information have made it into the app stores in the past.Use a password manager. As with all kinds of phishing, if a QR code takes you to an especially convincing fake website, a password manager will still know the difference and won't autofill your passwords, Haas says.
