Orlin Wagner/AP Images Using the latest data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics' Occupational Employment and Wage Statistics program (previously called the Occupational Employment Statistics program), we identified the 30 detailed occupations with the highest mean annual salaries as of May 2020, the most recent period for which data is available.Although data is for May 2020, the pandemic's effects on employment are not fully captured in these figures. The Bureau of Labor Statistics wrote in the news release about the latest data that these "estimates do not fully reflect the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic" as previous surveys from periods in 2017, 2018, and 2019 were also used. The 30 highest-paying occupations all earned an average of six figures annually, all above $130,000. Anesthesiologists, which ranked No. 1, earned more than triple the average annual salary for healthcare practitioners and technical occupations of $85,900 with an average annual salary of $271,440. All 30 of these occupations also make more than the overall average for all occupations in May 2020 of $56,310.In addition to ranking the average salaries, we also included the estimated number of people employed in each occupation as of May 2020, and a brief description of the occupation from the Labor Department's O*NET occupational database.
