Facebook Messenger is useful, but it has quite a few flaws and some of them are quite major. My latest issue is a notification badge on the app — on both my iPhone and iPad, and in the Facebook app on both as well on the [unnecessary] Messenger shortcut — that says I have one unread message. I've gone through my ENTIRE message history, message requests, and archive... I've read them all. I don't know what this phantom notification is for, but I've had to disable badges for Messenger because of this annoyance so I occasionally miss messages now. As it stands, it's a pathetic attempt by Facebook to get me to open their app.In some ways, this app has improved a lot with time. In others... not so much. There was a time when I used Messenger for as much as possible (especially with my friends who don't have iPhones, since SMS texting is so laughably archaic) but now I use it as little as possible. That change is partially due to my paradigm shift related to how I view social media in general, but it's mainly because of what Facebook has done with this app and their main service as well. At this point, I'm waiting for an innovative, useful, and fun replacement for Facebook — we're overdue one, and hopefully it'll be far superior. (Honestly, it wouldn't be difficult. Just care about user privacy and you've already got a huge advantage over Facebook) Messenger is getting a one star review from me of the sole reason that their internal browser is absolute garbage!!! it has wasted my time numerous times because I didn't realize I was on their browser!! SMH!! I shouldnt have to look when I click the link it should open up in my default browser not Facebook messenger browser that doesn't store my passwords for future use, auto fill my stuff or even work when I try to hit submit on an order!!Most recently I was trying to download professional photos from a professional photographer and it said I was saving them on the messenger browser but come to find out when I finished it didn't save a single one and then I had to open it in chrome which I thought I was in the first place!! RAWR!!!! I am absolutely fed up with the amount of time I've wasted but not realizing I was in the messenger browser and the fact that I have no way to control this or turn it off I am annoyed and I am going to delete this application if you guys don't make the necessary changes. And another thing when somebody tries to call you over messenger I should have the option to decline that call not have to sit and wait until it quits ringing!! Do you guys even test the functionality of your applications I'm beginning to question it!! With school being online, I have been using messenger as my main medium of communication among the peers. The more I use it, the more I get annoyed at how poorly the app is made. When I have a few messages unread, it would make sense to guide me to the place where I left off when I open the chat. However, I have to scroll ALL the way up to figure out where in the conversation I had left from, so it is especially difficult when I am in a group chat and missed more than a dozen messages. It is also impossible to find the date and the time of each messages, which makes it take an even more time and effort from my end to go through every message to get to where I left off. This should be a basic function in all messenger programs by now, so I don't understand why messenger wouldn't carry such an essential function. It is not user-friendly, as the updates have been only adding stuff that no one would ever make use of while ignoring the basic necessities. I also can't save or mark any messages if I need to go back to them. I truly hope you guys make the important updates soon.
